

Governing California

Making sense of our state of disarray

300 Californians. One Deliberative Poll. One What?

June 24, 2011, 7:04 am • Posted by Tyche Hendricks

Comments Off

Facebook

Twitter

Share

Email

Flickr: Chad Griffin

They'll be meeting in a hotel ballroom in Torrance all weekend... 300 Californians who represent a scientific, random sample of the people of this state. The event, called "What's Next California?" is billed as our first-ever statewide deliberative poll.

What the heck is a deliberative poll? You'd better ask James Fishkin, the head of Stanford University's Center on Deliberative Democracy.

It's essentially a new, in-depth kind of public opinion polling, according to Fishkin, where participants actually take time to learn about the issues, rather than shooting answers from the hip.

Here's a quick glimpse at a deliberative poll that took place in Michigan last year, where citizens tackled tough questions about tough economic times.

You can listen in on those Michigan citizens in more depth here in a PBS broadcast.

The California poll will tackle questions about how we might overhaul the way we govern ourselves in this state. The 300 citizens will be learning and talking about:

- legislative representation
- the initiative process
- state and local government restructuring
- taxation and fiscal policy.

Woohoo! I can hear you saying. Sounds like a rip-roaring time in Torrance!

Okay, yes, it's wonky stuff. But California governance could sure use some help. And if you spend a few minutes listening to the Michiganders in the PBS video, you might find it's pretty interesting. You're going to have people from vastly different backgrounds, with wildly divergent political views sitting down together in small groups actually listening to each other.

Here's Fishkin's preview of what it's all about. Even if you're not in Torrance, you can read up on the issues the participants will learn about and follow their agenda through the weekend on the "What's Next California?" website.

And stay tuned on this site for details of what transpires over the weekend.

The deliberative poll was organized by an assortment of non-partisan government reform groups: California Forward, the New America Foundation in California, the Public Policy Institute of California, the Nicolas Berggruen Institute, California Common Cause, the Bill Lane Center for the American West at Stanford University and the Davenport Institute at Pepperdine University. It is being coordinated by the Center for Deliberative Democracy at Stanford University and MacNeil/Lehrer Productions' By the People Project.

Filed under: Governance, Public Opinion

Tagged: Center on Deliberative Democracy, James Fishkin, PBS, Stanford University, Torrance, What's Next California

 RSS Subscribe

 Facebook

 Twitter

 Share

 Email

« PREV: Those Little Pots of Money

NEXT: Citizens Weigh in on California's Future »

The California Report is a production of KOED Public Radio.

Home | Archive | Special Coverage | Tune In | About | Contact Us

Generous support for The California Report is provided by:

The California Endowment | California HealthCare Foundation | Charitable Auto Resources | Chevron | The James Irvine Foundation | Walter S. Johnson Foundation | URS Corp. | The Westly Foundation

Copyright © 2011 KQED Inc. All Rights Reserved.

